It's been more than two decades since South Korea was the first country to conduct an underground nuclear test. (AP Photo/Mark Schiefelbein, File) SEOUL, South Korea — A massive nuclear bomb that could be used for both military and non-military purposes, including as a scientific tool, is set to be tested for the first time in South Korea in 20 years. Defense officials say a nuclear device similar to the one that North Korea conducted in 2006 will be detonated at a site some 10 kilometers (6.2 miles) southwest of Seoul, with an expected yield of 100 kiloton. The blast at Seoul's Ulchin Missile Test Facility is expected to be seen by millions of South Koreans through a large-scale radar system to detect and track nuclear weapons. It's due to start at about 6:25 a.m. Saturday local time

(0100 GMT), according to a statement from the Defense Ministry. Ulchin will hold the test for 10 seconds, the same time as North Korea's test in 2006, according to government officials. The U.S.-led campaign of sanctions against North Korea and its leader Kim Jong Un, followed by his country's ballistic missile tests, has raised concerns about the possibility of Pyongyang's sixth nuclear test. The country's nuclear test is a challenge to the international community and poses a risk of triggering a fresh nuclear crisis, analysts say. North Korea conducted five nuclear tests between 2006 and 2009 before announcing its first nuclear test in February 2013. It also conducted a long-range rocket launch in December
